ABSTRACT

We are living today in a knowledge society, a society shaped by the information revolution and advanced by communication technologies. At the dawn of this new age, the concept of “knowledge capital” has been used for the first time to explain the importance of intellectual resources - such as information, knowledge, and experience - in the modern economy. Copyright law aims to balance the competing policy goals of encouraging creativity and allowing public access to information. Having discussed the laws operating in different countries (such as the USA, Australia and Europe) the author concludes with the proposal to set an international standard norm.
